Worried About Carbon Monoxide Poisoning?

It has come to our attention again, like it usually does this time of year, that other companies are using “scare tactics” to sell HVAC equipment. Yes, it is true that carbon monoxide is odor-free and deadly. However, just because someone has a broken furnace does not mean it is leaking carbon monoxide. It is very important to be cautious without being overly concerned.

The best thing you can do is confirm the level of carbon monoxide when your HVAC technician is at your house. We can always test that for you. Also, it is very important to have a carbon monoxide detector in any sleeping/living area of your house. It does not need to be next to your furnace or water heater since you are not typically near those. If you sleep in different areas of the house, you will need multiple detectors.

If ever you are concerned, make sure you have your house tested immediately for carbon monoxide levels.
